The Middle East

Double-digit growth rates

The Middle East region contains some of the world's most diverse, challenging and rewarding markets. For German companies used to structure, order and single-digit growth rates of mature markets, the Middle East represents a fascinating but daunting prospect.

In aggregate, the region has a population of over 400 million, approximately the same as Western Europe. However, its attractions go beyond its size.

Demographically, the Middle East has some of the wealthiest consumer segments in the world, as well as a rapidly growing middle class with a strong international outlook.

Governments are investing in social and economic infrastructure, and the corporate sector is supported by a young generation workforce, the members of which are educated, connected, mobile and bilingual.

We believe there are opportunities for German businesses to look at the Middle East, both at the developed markets in the Gulf Cooperation Council, and also at some of the 'frontier' markets that have great long-term potential. However, a word of warning – markets are more competitive than some years ago, customers are more astute and local companies are stronger. It takes patience and resilience when you come to the Middle East and the return on investment might take longer than you expect, but the long-term rewards are significant.

Germany

Attractive and stable investment climate

For decades, Germany has been a country with a highly-developed economy. The opportunities for German investment are numerous, real and calculable. Germany offers Middle Eastern investors exciting national and international marketing and business prospects. The cultured, highly trained and educated population provides the medium for turning these perspectives to practical advantage.

Germany is fortunate to have emerged from the economic crisis largely unscathed. It is now called upon to lead the return to growth in Europe. This itself generates new investment opportunities. But, again, a word of caution – Germans are organised, punctual and like efficiency. Whilst being on time might be seen as a cultural difference compared to the Middle East, "German efficiency" might be an opportunity for Middle Eastern businessmen.

Your business

Growing and expanding

You are based either in Germany or in the Middle East and you plan to expand your business activities to the other region, or you are already active outside your home.

You would like to find an advisor who is familiar with the local requirements, who understands your concerns and in whom you can trust.

You are looking for an expert that supports your new, or improves your existing, business operations and aligns your business with the local market to realise your potential and new business opportunities.

You are seeking advice with respect to accounting practices and compliance regulations in the other country, have questions about tax implications of
